THE ALL-WHITE HAT IS IN HIGH FAVOR.

Among the very early fall models there are a great number of attractive all-white hats, many of which are intended for the younger set of society. They are built along tailored lines, and trimmed with huge wings and ribbon. The smartest of these are medium in size, because a hat with a brim extending out over the face and the full coiffure is very much more becoming to the youthful face than a close fitting hat. In the picture the brim turns up half in inch all around the edge and the left side lifts a trifle in cavalier style. The back brim is the same width as the front, though the sides are a trifle wider. The crown is rather high, banded with white satin ribbon and trimmed directly in the front with a short looped bow so arranged that it quite conceals the rown. Under the left side of this bow are set two broad white wings, springing backward over the left brim. There is a very shallow cache peigne which aids in fitting the hat proper to the head, but does not lift it off the head. This is swathed in maline, the color of the hair. CONTROL CONTRO

EW YORK, Aug. 19 .- Of all the fashionable watering places near New York, Saratoga Springs leads by a long distance. The month of August is devoted to the race course by all fashionable people who find themselves located there for the summer. At the invitation of Mrs. Frances E. Pryor and her daughter, Monta, Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Easton spent three days at this gay resort and saw something of "life on the race track." The wealth displayed, and the excitement attendant on such a scene, was almost beyond belief. In all that wild assembly of sports, one figure stood alone, the cynosure of many eyes, alone and unnoticed, except a brief nod odeasionally bestowed by some passerby. This was Tod Sioan, ex-turfman, once king of the race track, the pet of reyalty only a few years since; he seemed the only sad figure in that pleasure loving crowd. If he was the only sad one there, he was also the most interesting to those who have fellowed his career; to note the different expressions that expressions is force. Springs leads by a long dis-

"He was a man, take him for all in all, I chall not look upon his like again."

NCE in a while, we hear woman tell of the man helpless about the house. Wives whose husbands cannot driva a nall without crushing their thumbs are a little apt to put it down, that all men are sadiy awkward and "er's room are drawn, and she is supposed to sleep, according to orders, until noon, when a welcome step on the porch will awaken her to the fact that she is ahout to receive a cheery greeting, a poached egg, and a cup of tea. Through the long afternoon, if visitors do not happen to drop in, whether comfortable or in pain, she is contented, looking forward with joy to the homecoming of this boy in the evening, who

MODEL OF CLIPPED BEAVER WITH PLUMES.

Clipped beavers in black, navy blue and the fashionable browns, will be worn this season for semi-dressy wear, trimmed with ribbons, flowers, bstrich plumes and the various other feathered effects classed as novelties. The high crowned broad brimmed shape is perhaps the most attractive, the brim crown from three to four inches high. These hats are not worn on the back of the head as the summer model of this type was, but are tilted a little to the front and the right side by an inch bandeau, trimmed simply with maline of a color to match the hair. No matter what the color of the hat may be, this bandeau trimming is always selected to match the coiffure. The crown of this hat is trimmed with brown satin ribbon, the hat being of this same brown tone, and two very full medium length brown plumes are posed at the side beneath a bunch of white roses, the tips drooping backward and over the back brim. The under brim of this hat is faced with brown satin.

helpless, and always under foot when will care for her, nor leave her again at home.

For the past ten years, a young man of the writer's acquaintance has virtually given his life to his mother. A well regulated little home is kept livable and happy, first by the mother and then by the boy. The boy, because haif of the time the mother is lil, helplessly ill and in bed, and then behold him rise nobly, patiently and skilfully to the occasion. Tender, cheerful and handy, as a well-trained nurse—in fact, some trained nurses might do well to take a little instruction from him—he cares for this mother through the night, nor is found nappling when the clock chimes the signal for medicine or nourishment. Bright and early in the morning, the little house is made tidy, the orders given to grocer, butcher and milkman; in the summer, the lawn, in the winter the heating are not overlooked; a breakfast, that a queen might not refuse to eat, its served on a snowy and inviting tray, and carried to the sick room, and it is very seldom that "mother" has to be coaxed to eat. After the dishes are cleared away, the blinds in the moth-Mrs. S. W. Eccles and her daughter Mildred and Mrs. Will Bennett arrived from Europe on the Blucher, of the Hamburg-American line, the 13th. Mrs. Bennett left at once for the west to meet Mr. Bennett and her little daughter Grace in Chicago. Mr. Bennett will return to the west, while Mrs. Bennett and daughter will come east to their home to remain until Mr. Bennett's work is finished. Mrs. Eccles

"Oh, mother is just indulging in one of her little spells, for a change," he will say, with a smile, when acquaintances suspecting from his rather haggard aspect that such is the case, make

A boy in a thousand, you will say. No doubt, yet this is one exception, contrary to the rule firmly implanted in the minds of many of the gentler sex in regard to the utter helplessness

Once upon a time, in the silent annals of our city's history, a young man married. The happiness in that little home was one day made complete by the arrival of a young son. Troubles, they say, never come singly; nor blessings doublly it would seem, for when the second blessing came to that home in the perfect form of a little daughter, the mother passed away.

A few months went by and one day the neighbors awoke to the rare and beautiful truth, that a brave and noble man was assuming the double part of aboring man, but the children never knew the hardships of proverty, for they were yet too young to realize the father's denials, while he filled all their little wants from the toil of his hands, and the love of his heart.

and the love of his heart.

At the age of six, the little girl joined her brother in school. The father made ready the simple breakfast, and the children for school; nor did he overlook the matter of lunch, which he always prepared and blaced in their joint little basket. At night, tired and weary from labor, he cooked supper, heard the lessons, and but the youngsters early to bed. On Sundays, he baked the bread for the coming week, mended holes in stockings, zig-zig tears in pinafores, and rips and gaps in waistcoats.

This father's courage was constantly in pinatores, and rips and gaps in waistcoats.

This father's courage was constantly fed by locking forwyard to the time, when his children should be man and woman grown—a real man and a real woman—of sterling worth, and a comfort to him in his riper years. The little daughter seemed to especially fill his heart's loneliness, so much she resembled her mother in look and action. But there came a day, a crushing day, when he returned one evening, to find her lying upon the bed, silent, and with an angel's smile upon her little face. The neighbors had placed her there; they were still standling about her, when that father entered. Every eye was wet, as they stepped aside to make room for him. It was a sudden and painless death, they told him, when he could bear to hear them speak; heart fallure from over-jumping of the rope. He said nothing, but kneeling down by the bed-side of that loved one, buried his face in his hands. One by one the neighbors crept away from that sacred room, and breathless waited and watched. By and by he joined them. God had conquered. A beautiful caim rested upon his face, like that of his child, and he turned to those waiting ones and said:

"She has gone to her mother. I have

"She has gone to her mother. I have had my turn. God knows best."

During the ploneer days, a young father was left with the care of an infant, but a few months old. No, the mother had not died. Far worse than death had carried her away, willingly, to return to that home, no more. The dreadful shock and shame of it was enough to turn that young husband's brain. Some men would have thought it sufficient excuse for the wine cup. This man stood the test. Night after night, found him walking the floor with his colic-tossed baby. It was enough that a neighbor must care for the child during the day while he worked. After that, his conscience told him the care was his own, as the child was his own. One day that dread disease, smallpox, visited his cabln, and of course he was cut off from any help, save that of the doctor. And how he watched that child, denying himself rost and food in the watching, till the crisis was passed. Only his nursing saved the little life, for the doctor was not as doctors of today, aithough he went by the name, his knowledge extended not much farther than the medical volume, "The Family Doctor," and a few simple herb remedies. When the babe was convalescing, the young father would place her in a snug, sunny corner, while he laid out his spring garden. When he was able to go again to his work, he carried her with him, for a time, lest some neglect on the part of a neighbor, should bring about a fatal relapse.

The babe thanks to the father only, arrived at beautiful young womanhood, with the height of his ambition for her fully realized—a musical education. For this he worked and toiled all through those first lonely years. For this he did the part of woman as well as father. Nor did the daughter fail him in the end for all his tender care and pains. An old man in a child's home, was never so cherished. Cordelia of old could have done no more for her father, King Lear, though she expressed it, exactly: t, exactly:

"Good my lord, You have begot me, bred me, loved Return those duties back as they are Obey you, love you, and most honor you,"

A train was pulling into Salt Lake one morning. It was very early, and the people of the Pullman, having breakfasted, were returning to their seats and belongings. As each one passed along, attention was called to a man sitting with a little fellow on his knee. He was buttoning up the little frock, and brushing out the curls. No one had seen him before, because he had entered the sleeper at a late hour the night before. His face was very sad, despite his smiles and baby-talk. The baby had but one little foot. An accident had carried away the other one, and while the doctor of his country town had done all he could, the father was not satisfied, and was bringing the child to the city to seek higher skill and knowledge.

"His mother," he explained to one or two who were deeply moved and interested, "couldn't come; she's in bed with his little new sister; oh, I know how to care for him, I was my own mother's nurse-girl, long enough when I was a boy. "I can mother a baby, all right."
